

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

TWENTY-SECOND ANNUAL DINNER OF THE NEW YORK SOUTHERN SOCIETY.

The Twenty-second annual dinner of the New York Southern Society, was held in the Grand Ball Room of the Waldorf-Astoria, on Wednesday evening, December 11, 1907.

Mr. Walter L. McCorkle, Mr. Lindsay Russell and Dr. Charles Baskerville constituted the Dinner Committee.

The toasts and speakers at the dinner were as follows:

"The Unity of the Republic," Hon. James M. Beck.

"The New New England," Rev. Dr. Rockwell Harmon Potter.

"The Universe from Mars to Ireland," Hon. John J. Delaney.

At the conclusion of the Dinner, the President, Dr. John A. Wyeth, acting as toastmaster, after the customary toast to the President of the United States, introduced the speakers as follows:

DR. WYETH: Ladies of the Southern Society: There is not a man in this assemblage, whether of Southern extraction or "to the manor born and native here" where we of the South have found a welcome and a home, who does not look up to you, and who will not obey you as you tell them to be patient with one whom they have highly honored with the Presidency of this Society, one who feels no little embarrassment at the task before him, in which he feign would hope to do even half so well as his immediate predecessor.

To you, fellow members of the New York Southern Society, your Ex-President has given the devotion of many years of faithful and successful service as Chairman of your Finance Committee, as Chairman of the Annual Dinner Committee, and as your President two of the most satisfactory years in the history of the Society.

Moreover, out of the undying affection in which he holds you, he has also presented to you for all the years to come, this beautiful gavel of ivory and silver. The old gavel was made of Georgia pine but in the course of time it was discovered that even a pine knot was neither heavy nor hard enough to enforce order when it came to settle the differences between South Carolina, East Tennessee, Texas and the tide water section of Virginia.

The South Carolinians wanted a palmetto hammer with a rattlesnake handle; the Tennesseecians held out for "Old Hickory;" the Texas rangers thought that mesquite was good enough for them, while the scions of the Old Dominion insisted upon a gavel made from the root of the old oak upon which the head of Captain John Smith rested when the Indian war club was about to descend upon it. But with keen foresight our Ex-President had this beautiful gavel made of material found in no Southern state, and with the happy suggestion of economic conditions in the country from which he came, had the handle made white and the malleus colored.

As his friend and yours, I present to you even as the will of Caesar, this token of his loyalty and devotion, and for you and for myself I say feelingly in the words of that song of the Highlands which will ever find a responsive chord in the human heart, "I love you, Douglas, tender and true."

Upon the manubrium there is engraved, "Presented to the New York Southern Society, by Marion J. Verdery, March 7, 1907," while the malleus is girded with a band of silver, "Even as the fabled Cytherea's zone, binding all things in beauty," in the center of which is the Southern Cross enclosed within a laurel wreath. On either side the names of the States of the South which we and our ancestors claim as our home, that home to which no matter how strong the ties that bind us here, our hearts must ever turn with fond emotion. That land where the fireside is the altar, where every woman is a Queen and every man a subject.

Sentiment was the chief factor in the organization of this society. The sentiment was expressed in the articles of incorporation, to cherish and perpetuate the traditions and memories of the South. Reverence for woman is our one tradition, and as to the memories of the South, what a flood sweeps us on with its current when we think of her history. Maryland, Virginia, the Carolinas, the Empire State of the South, while beyond, her shores warmed with the tropic seas, Florida, the land of sun and flowers. Arching the southern gulf Alabama, Mississippi, and

Louisiana, while far to the Golden West, that mighty kingdom of the "Lone Star State," and inland, Arkansas, Missouri, Tennessee and Kentucky stand in solid phalanx as sponsors for the "Mighty Father of Waters."

Not boastfully, yet proud of our heritage, we cherish the memories of the land where we first saw the light; of Maryland, the home of the Howards, and the Carrolls; of Stephen Decatur whose heroism in the harbor of Tripoli a century ago was pronounced by Admiral Nelson as the most daring act of the age; of Edgar Allan Poe whose poems, "The Raven" and "Israfel" made him immortal and whose prose works translated to-day into every language of the civilized world, acclaim him the greatest writer of fiction the American continent has ever produced; the home of our own Randall who wrote the Marsellaise of the South, "Maryland, my Maryland;" of Francis Scott Key, the author of our national anthem, "The Star Spangled Banner;" of William Coate Pinkney who died while yet the flush of youth was on his cheek, the author of some of the most exquisite lines it has ever been my privilege to read, who true to the traditions of his people, paid next to Shakespeare the most beautiful compliment that has ever been paid to woman:

"I fill this cup to one made up
Of loveliness alone,
A woman, of her gentle sex
The seeming paragon;

To whom the better elements
And kindly stars have given
A form so fair, that, like the air
'Tis less of earth than heaven.

Her health, and would on earth there stood
Some more of such a frame,
That life might be all poetry,
And weariness a name."

And last but not least, of Edwin Booth, not only the greatest tragedian, in the humble opinion of the speaker, the world has ever seen, but above and beyond that, one of Nature's noblemen.

And of Virginia, what need I say of her? In the language of the great orator of New England, "She needs no encomium; there she stands, behold her." Her story is the story of the republic. The land of Washington who had he needed a greater immortality, received it when Byron wrote of him as "The Cincinnatus of the West, whom envy dared not hate;" of Jefferson who in the Declaration of Independence gave liberty a meaning; the land of Madison, Monroe, George Wythe and Patrick Henry whose eloquence fanned the flame of revolution until the hopes of English dominion over the United Colonies perished in the conflagration; the land of the Lees, of Tyler, Winfield Scott, Zachary Taylor and a host of others of the South beyond the Old Dominion, the names and deeds of whom, were I only to mention, would take time which this occasion will not permit.

There are others here to speak to you, and one, the first upon our list, has much to say of "The Unity of the Republic." There was a time when that which we of the South represented stood for a dual republic, the independence of the Southern Confederacy, but in the Providence of God the cause was to be lost, and I am one who fought for the Confederacy, and accept the verdict of the Almighty that it was best for all of us that our cause should fail. I introduce to you the Hon. James M. Beck.

MR. BECK: Mr. Toastmaster, Gentlemen of the Southern Society, Ladies and Gentlemen:

I join with you in expressing the deep regret that we are not honored to-night by having the first of the responses made by the distinguished President of Princeton University. A Southern man and yet the President of a Northern College, Woodrow Wilson is one of the most distinguished citizens of the Republic at the present hour. (Applause). I had anticipated with very great pleasure, as you all did, hearing that which we could very well expect would be a scholarly utterance. Of President Wilson I can only say, in the words of that excellent beverage which bears his name, he is "Wilson, that's all." (Applause and laughter).

I do not like to fill the gap that Woodrow Wilson has unexpectedly and unintentionally caused. I am frank to say I do not welcome the opportunity to lead off in this vaudeville of post prandial oratory. I am reminded of an incident in natural history, of which Henry Armet Brown tells us, that whenever a herd of elephants are about to cross a river in the jungles of Africa it always sends a little elephant across first to see whether there are any hidden crocodiles in the stream, and it occurs to me as barely possible that I am sent upon this mission in behalf of the succeeding speakers, in order if there are any crocodiles in the audience I may be snapped up first. (Laughter).

However, I will endeavor to do the very best to the extent of my modest ability, not in any way to replace, but simply to take the place of Woodrow Wilson.

I have sometimes questioned, I am frank to say, the value of after-dinner oratory at all. I do not mean to question the value of public dinners, for I believe that this custom of "breaking bread together" is not merely an ancient but a very noble ceremonial. I do not share the somewhat bilious mood of the young Prince of Denmark who, when he walked the moonlit battlements of Elsinore and heard within the castle the sounds of revelry, moodily exclaimed, "it is a custom more honored in the breach than in the observance." On the contrary, I would rather accept the genial, joyous philosophy of that dear old pedant and philosopher Dr. Samuel Johnson, when he said that the raison d'être for the public dinner was that eating was about the only thing about which all men were absolutely agreed, and, therefore, starting with that common bond of accord it was easy for the diners to find other and substantial bonds of unity. I do not share the view of Disraeli, who once heard a somewhat deaf member of Parliament bemoaning that he was unable to hear the eloquent speeches in Parliament, and Disraeli bawled in his ear: "My dear sir, you scarcely appreciate your natural advantages." (Laughter).

However, I fear that I shall but feebly vindicate whatever claims the after-dinner orator may have to the respectful attention of the strenuous people of New York, and, I am afraid, before I shall have advanced very far in crossing this stream filled, as it may be with these crocodiles that you may feel very much as did a certain gentleman in Boston who, having heard that Ralph Waldo Emerson was to speak at Tremont Temple, by mistake got in next door, where it so happened that Artemus Ward was lecturing, and when this stranger emerged and was asked what he thought of Ralph Waldo Emerson he said he thought he was "pretty good but not quite what he expected." (Laughter).

However, perhaps in all this introduction I was unnecessarily borrowing trouble, but in these strenuous days in New York, Mr. Chairman, trouble is about the only thing you can borrow unless you have good collateral. (Laughter and applause).

Now I have quoted the remark of Dr. Johnson about eating being the great bond of accord between all men, and I do not need this presence of the Southern Society to remind me of the fact, for your eloquent chairman has already done so, that there is another and a very substantial bond of unity between all men, that bond so fairly and beautifully represented by the ladies in the gallery. (Applause). I think it was eminently characteristic of Southern chivalry that the very first word that your distinguished chairman uttered to this audience was "Ladies of the Southern Society" and in that I saw (and I never saw the same observance in any one of these public dinners in New York) the characteristic chivalry which the men of the South have always borne to the women of the South. (Applause). And I feel tempted, because the chairman has sounded the key-note, to lift my eyes for a moment to those celestial heights, whence, if at all, my inspiration must come, and, although it is not pertinent to my theme, to suggest this fact to the Southern Society, that while in this country, above every other, the regard for woman is almost worship, yet as a matter of fact, and a curious fact, of all the countries in the world it has been the one in which woman has enjoyed the least possible political influence, probably because she has never cared to exert any. I am not unaware of all that woman has done in the history of our country, I am reminded of the fact that when George Washington and his gallant soldiers were suffering so greatly at Valley Forge and some of the ladies of my native city of Philadelphia sent them clothes and food, that Washington, with the characteristic courtesy and chivalry of the Southern cavalier sent this gracious message to the fair donors of the needful food and clothing, I want you to observe that Southern chivalry which was shown even in that dreadful moment of suffering by the supreme commander of our armies, he said: "an army ought not to regard its sacrifices when they meet with so flattering a reward as in the sympathy of your sex, nor can it fear that its interests will be neglected when espoused by advocates at once so powerful and yet so amiable." (Applause).

I am glad that Dr. Woodrow Wilson is not here, for I would take my life in my hands if I spoke sweepingly of American history in his presence. In his absence I venture the statement that in all the history of this country there have been few instances of the baleful influence of women in the political life of America, I except the part that Madam Jumel played in the lives of Aaron Burr and Alexander Hamilton, or the later part played in the administration of Andrew Jackson by Peggy Eaton, yet in no case was there any direct influence upon the Executive Department of our Government. And to me it is a most gracious and beautiful fact that no Pompadour or Montespan ever degraded the politics of this country. We do not ask women in this country to be our equal because we freely acknowledge her innate superiority. (Applause). To her queenly office we bow; hers is the only order of nobility which we acknowledge. I can only say of woman, and in so doing I am but voicing the sentiment of the Southern cavaliers here assembled, what the late Izak Walton said of the strawberry, that "doubtless God could have made a better fruit than the strawberry, but doubtless God Almighty never did." (Applause).

An American woman first wove an American Flag and flung it to the breeze, and while that flag floats in every wind and under the whole heavens, so long will there remain in the heart of every American profound respect for God's best creation—Woman. (Prolonged applause).

I sent up that little piece of pyrotechnics (laughter) because I knew that Mr. Delaney was to follow me and when you have an Irishman with characteristic blarney to follow, it is well for you to get in your work first. (Laughter).

Gentlemen of the Southern Society, I have been asked to respond to the toast "The Unity of the Republic" and may we not, on the threshold, thank the God of our fathers that that unity is to-night a glorious reality (applause) and not a mere hope or aspiration. (Applause). That unity, I think, is manifested by that event of next week, when our "invincible armada" will weigh its anchor in Hampton Roads and commence its long voyage to the Southern Cross, and the Alabama, the Louisiana and the Kentucky will keep abreast with the Oregon, the New York and the Connecticut. (Applause). I need not remind a Southern audience that while the Connecticut will be the Flag-ship and will lead the squadron, yet upon the bridge, as the representative of a united country, will be a Rear-Admiral who is a Virginian by birth. Need I remind this audience that the true Commander-in-Chief of that squadron, at whose word it will weigh anchor, and by whose orders it will continue its voyage, the Supreme Commander of the Army and Navy of the United States, is himself the son of a Northern father and a Southern mother. (Applause).

We can contrast this scene of next Tuesday when our united battle-ships shall weigh anchor and commence their voyage, with an event almost forgotten by this generation, when on the 4th of March, 1861, from the Eastern portico of the Capitol of the United States a gaunt, tall figure, bearing on his face the traces of mental suffering, pathetically, as it seems to me, adjured his fellow countrymen, north and south of the Mason and Dixon line, to be friends and not enemies, and it was not merely with the ken of a statesman, but, in the light of future events, we can see it was with the foresight of a prophet that Abraham Lincoln, in his first inaugural address, uttered those words which I think were the most beautiful that ever fell from his lips and which I shall take the liberty of quoting: Said he to his countrymen of all sections:

"We are not enemies but friends. We must not be enemies. Though passion may strain, it must not break our bonds of affection." And then he added, not merely with the foresight of a prophet, but with the inspiration of a poet, "The mystic chords of memory, stretching from every battlefield and every patriotic grave to every living hearthstone, will yet swell the chorus of the Union, when it is touched as it will surely be, by the angel of our better natures."

In those words, I have said, Lincoln was a prophet, and he saw then, or must have seen, as in a vision, that the unity of this Republic could not be preserved by mere force, that it would require these "mystic chords of memory," these profound appeals to the human heart, in order to allay the waves of sectional passion then running so high, for after all, Gentlemen, of the Southern Society, the Civil War never commenced at Sumpter, nor did it end at Appomattox. The Civil War raged long before the first shot was fired and it raged in the hearts of our people long after Lee placed his sword in the hand of the chivalrous Grant. Over ruined fields and new made graves, and desolated hearthstones, men of the North and men of the South gazed at each other for many years with hatred that seemed almost implacable. And when and how was the first real note of reconciliation. It was not until 1876, when Philadelphia, the true hearthstone of the nation, invited men of the North and men of the South and men of the East and men of the West to be its guests and to recall to memory, with the great mother city, the common glories of the Republic, that then for the first time those "mystic chords of memory" of which Lincoln so beautifully spoke, vibrated again with the recollection of the common glories of the Republic, and while I was only a boy at the time, I can never forget that May 10th, 1876, when in the beautiful park of Philadelphia, which, flecked with vernal daisies and buttercups, was nature's "Field of the Cloth of Gold," that men of the North and men of the South met again in common fraternity, and forgetting all that had passed in the dreary travail of the Civil War, clasped hands and dedicated themselves anew to the great and sublime task of reconstructing this great and noble Republic. (Applause).

And, therefore, to-night, with one flag, with one people, with one land and with one destiny, we can meet in this City of New York, and reverently thank, as did the Chairman, the God of our fathers that the unity of the Republic is something more than an idle dream.

I want you to pardon me a few serious words as to the true basis of that unity, and here I most invoke your indulgent attention. I suppose the common and superficial view is that we are a united people because some fifty colonial ancestors of ours met in May, 1787, in Philadelphia, and there subscribed their names to a document which we call the Constitution of the United States. That idea is a common and superficial one for the reason that the dead never yet shackled the living, and it is not within the power of any paper contract of itself to make this country one and inseparable and indivisible. On the contrary, the true basis of the unity of the Republic lies partly in that to which we have already referred, "the mystic chords of memory," the common heritage of patriotism, the heritage of every American, but also much more deeply and permanently in the great underlying and inevitable bonds of commercial interest. In other words, it is the shining bands of steel that girdle our country, it is the innumerable wires that are the sensitive nerves of our national organism, it is in the multiplicity of means of intercommunication that create that unity of the Republic. Every traveller in our country marvels at the identity of interests, identity of sentiment, identity of policy, in this broad land, although its territory ranges from the gulf to the lakes and from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Let us not ignore the commercial bond of unity which has welded us together as in unbreakable hooks of steel. Your Charles Carroll of Carrollton, when he inaugurated, on the 4th day of July, I think, 1833, the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, the first real railroad in the United States, with the foresight of a prophet and as if he saw in exalted vision the marvelous development of intercommunication between the Atlantic and the Pacific, said: "This event is only second in importance to the adoption of the Declaration of Independence itself." He was right, for when the Constitution of our Country was adopted the ablest publicists of the world did not believe it could possibly be perpetual. Frederick the Great said that it was impossible that a federal republic could long endure over a country so widely scattered and so infinitely diversified, and it is a fact that the very framers of the Constitution, with the exception of old Benjamin Franklin, who as from a mountain range, saw much farther than his fellows, I say these framers believed, and honestly believed that the Constitution of 1787 was a temporary makeshift, an expedient for the moment to rescue this country from then prevailing chaos.

But Charles Carrollton saw that it was the construction of the railroads that was to weld into indissoluble wedlock that which God had joined together and it was not to be within the power of mortal man thereafter to put it asunder.

Have you, Gentlemen of the Southern Society, ever tried to reason out what would have happened if, instead of Lee placing his sword at Appomattax, in the hands of Grant, it had been Grant, who had surrendered the last remnant of the union armies to the great Southern Commander. Would our country be today two great republics separated by the Mason and Dixon's line? I for my part do not believe it for one moment. I believe, long ere this day of grace 1907, those same "mystic chords of memory" of which Lincoln so eloquently spoke, those same unbreakable links of steel with which the country is begirt, would have constrained both the new republic south of Mason and Dixon's line and the old republic north of the Mason and Dixon's line to forget their differences and long since they would have assumed their true place in the family of nations as an indivisible Republic. (Applause).

The fact is, and this, if you will pardon me, is the serious note of my speech, it is too rarely remembered that the unification of our Government has proceeded from the centripetal influences of steam and electricity and not principally from our written Constitution, and because these great forces of steam and lightning, which are greater, infinitely greater than any man-made Constitution, have advanced with accelerated speed that to-night there is in this country a clash between actual conditions and constitutional theories, and it is one of the profound causes for the financial convulsion, under which we are now suffering. The condition of our country shows a certain dislocation in our constitutional machinery; in other words, to-night commerce, by no act of any party, by no act of any section, by no act of any man, commerce is to-night one and indivisible, and not as our Constitution assumed divisible, and it is simply beyond the power of men, whatever our written Constitution may be, to make that divisible which in its nature has become absolutely indivisible. And to-night we see what. We see in the same orbit of commerce two great sovereign powers, each claiming to be sovereign, attempting to move in the same direction. We see that which has appalled the foreign and domestic investor, that which, as a great cloud, hangs over the industrial interests of our country, its great industrial and transportation interests being absolutely ground between the upper and the nether mill-stone of State and Federal authority. (Applause).

As Mr. Cleveland said, that is not a theory, but a condition that confronts us. Either we must leave to the States the power to regulate the rates of transportation and withhold it absolutely from the Federal Government, or we must give it to the Federal Government and withhold it from the States. In other words, you cannot segregate the capital of transportation companies, between interstate and domestic commerce; you cannot divide an indivisible thing so that the power of the central government and the power of the state governments shall alike claim sovereign power over that which is, in its very essence and last analysis, a unit. And until we have solved this difficulty, and I am not here to say what solution there will be, there will be no lasting industrial peace in this country, for it is absolutely inconceivable that industrial and financial interests will continue to be subject, not merely to one sovereign but to many.

I have spoken of this because it leads to this subject, and that is that there is to-day a certain recrudescence of the spirit of sectionalism, I do not mean now sectionalism that has its line of demarkation at Mason and Dixon's line, because—thank God, that is obliterated, but the spirit of sectionalism that has prevailed for the last eleven years in this country, that has hung over the great industrial interests of this country like a heavy cloud, and has as its line of demarkation the line of the Bronx. In other words there is between New York and the rest of the country a certain latent spirit of hostility. I remember once hearing a President of the United States say that the attitude of the rest of the country to the City of New York was one of "jealous admiration" and I think there was a good deal of force in that statement. And upon the other hand, I believe it to be true that the men of New York have often been too short sighted; too often their vision has been bounded by the boundary of the Bronx and they have failed to see that that which injures South and West must necessarily have its reflex action upon the East, particularly the City of New York.

I do not want to unduly prolong this serious note, nor postpone the pleasure we have in the two other speakers but I want briefly to illustrate this by the events of the last eleven months. We have seen in that period a spirit of increasing hostility to this great City of New York. We have seen, not merely in the South but in the West, a feeling that whatever happened to New York was its misfortune and could not possibly be the misfortune of the rest of the country. Why, it was not many months ago that the West and South, with their banks overflowing with reserves, with their granaries bursting with the harvest said of the great financial convulsion in lower Manhattan Island that "after all it was only a gambler's panic, only a lot of speculators in New York for whose misfortune the rest of the country need not really care, but that so far as the rest of the country was concerned, it was prosperous and need not care what happened to this great metropolis." Well, the hour has now come that we know that the man who laughs at the misfortune of New York is guilty of the infinite folly of the man who, being able to walk upon his legs and to use his arms would yet be absolutely indifferent to the irregular beating of his heart. In other words, we know that in this great City steam and electricity have focussed the great trinity of forces, namely, production, transportation and credit, and that if you strike New York, the rest of the country cannot possibly escape the force of the blow. (Applause).

Speaking to Southern men who live in New York, I believe I can say with very truth that the events of the last three months have not been altogether to the discredit of New York. When the roll call was made on the national banks it was found that it was New York whose banks' reserves were depleted to the extent of over fifty millions of dollars in order to send from New York to the furthestmost part of the land that blood of capital and it was the rest of the country that, far from having depleted bank reserves, were found to have more bank reserves than were ever known before in the history of banking on those sections. And let it be remembered that it was the bankers of New York, in the bitter travail of the last two months, when the very fabric of our National credit was tottering and threatened to fall into irremediable ruin, that shipped from this City a hundred millions of dollars to other parts of the country and obtained it from the treasure house of Europe by the payment at their own cost of at least three million dollars. When negotiations, in the last four weeks, were pending, to import from the bank of France a hundred millions of Francs (twenty millions of dollars) one New York banker, possibly aided by one or two associates who have stood shoulder to shoulder with him, offered, out of his own pocket, to spend two hundred thousand dollars in order that this city, and therefore this country, should get this twenty millions of French gold, and when the roll of honor is called, let not the name of J. Pierpont Morgan be forgotten. (Applause).

We have had in this country for some years past a campaign of denunciation against New York, followed by legislation of a destructive character, and yet when that propaganda has brought its inevitable result and when the Secretary of the Treasury comes to the relief, not only of New York, but through New York to the relief of the entire country, we are greeted with this same sectional feeling, not so much, I believe, in the South as in the West, that Secretary Cortelyou, in injecting fresh blood into that which is at least industrially the very heart of America, has in some way been unjust to the rest of the country, and it is even said that he has violated the letter of the law. Let me tell you an anecdote of Ulysses Simpson Grant. When one of his subordinates was ordered to take a certain stand in a certain campaign, and there remained although he was not attacked, when he heard from afar the sound of heavy and continuous cannonading, he could resist no more and, without orders, he left his post and marched to the relief of the beleaguered legions of the army; they attempted to courtmartial him and General Grant who, though a man of few words, seldom said an unwise one, answered the critics of his subordinate by the simple statement, "Heavy cannonading revokes all orders." (Laughter and applause). And when the very gate of America was being heavily cannonaded by the forces of disaster, when it seemed as if a wave of destruction would result greater than twenty earthquakes in San Francisco, or two Russo-Japanese wars, if in that supreme moment, upon which the value of every man's securities depended, Secretary Cortelyou, mistakenly or correctly, tried to rally the forces of credit and to instill courage, I think we can apply to him those tolerant words of General Grant: "Heavy cannonading revokes all orders." (Applause).

Gentlemen, I have unduly trespassed upon your patience and yet I think I would make my meaning unintelligible if I did not simply say in conclusion that if this lesson can be learned as a result of the last eleven months the five billions of dollars that have been lost will not have been spent in vain. We are all one body, we cannot strike any part of America without hurting every other part. The heavy losses of the year will not be wholly lost if we can only gain the simple, practical homely wisdom of our fathers, as voiced by the practical and jocose Franklin, who when the Declaration of Independence was being signed, turned to his compatriots and said, "Gentlemen, we must all hang together or we will all hang separately," and that is the great lesson of this hour. (Prolonged applause).

DR. WYETH: Our next speaker is the Rev. Dr. Rockwell Harmon Potter of Hartford, Conn., Pastor of one of the oldest churches in New England, a Church the influence of which for good was felt long before the outbreak of the Revolution. He brings to us a message from the new New England.

REV. DR. POTTER: Mr. President, Gentlemen of the Southern Society, and your guests, the Ladies:

The old New England is famed in song and story. Our noblest writers and our sweetest singers have interpreted for us the beauty of her physical features, and the heroism and passion of her noble people. Far be it from me to attempt to speak to you of the beauty that lies concealed and yet revealed in her rock-ribbed hills and green clad valleys, or to speak of the life of that people as it toiled and struggled through the early years of our country's history.

I come to speak to you of the southland and to say to you that we in New England are in a new day, are facing a new task and are daring a new achievement. The glamour of expectancy that hangs over a new country is gone from us. We no longer wake up in the morning expecting to find coal in the back yard or gold shining in our mountain brooks. We know that whatever we may achieve must be achieved by the strength of our hands and by the clear thinking of our brains. We do not count this loss; we are seeing things as they are. I come to say that in this new New England we shall be loyal to the principles of the old New England.

In old New England there stood in every valley the little red school-house and on every hilltop the little white meeting-house, and in the little red school-house and in the little white meeting-house alike, one principle was preached, one doctrine taught, the doctrine of individual intelligence, integrity and responsibility. In response to that doctrine and that teaching the old New England achieved its life and sent its name around the world. In the new New England we are seeking to teach the same truth; in the new New England we are seeking to establish the same principle. New conditions face us; men are coming to us from other shores. If you know what is the problem of the race, we know what is the problem of the races. (Applause). But we are purposing in the new New England to make every man know that he counts one, whether he comes to us from the sun-kissed hills of ancient Italy, or from Sicily, whose feet, as they have been kissed by the waves of the Mediterranean have been swept upon by all the history of the ancient world; or from the cliffs that circle around the island-gemmed Aegean, or Hungary's heights and high plateaus; or from the plains of Russia where the bitter winds of the north sweep, from the towns, those battered towns upon which those still more bitter winds of bigotry and hatred have swept one host unto death and are sweeping another host upon our shores and they are coming to us from all those lands by the thousand, we are purposing to teach them every one that in New England every man counts one. We are purposing to kindle their hearts with the torch of freedom, to feed that flame with the fuel of opportunity and responsibility, and in the heat of that fire to forge the links of human brotherhood that shall be indissoluble.

And again, in the old New England there was the town meeting, as Thomas Jefferson, your own Thomas Jefferson truly said, "the best system of government ever devised by man," and John Fiske adds what makes it a general proposition, "for small communities." The old New England town meeting had as its basic principle social co-operation and efficiency, by means of that system of government each town became an organism seeking the welfare of its people. We are purposing to teach those who come to us from other lands, in the midst of our problem of the races, this principle also.

In south-eastern Europe they have been accustomed to a closely knit political organization under monarchical forms. We believe that they will come to learn what a closely knit social organization may be, under democratic forms and we are seeking by every form of pedagogy that we can bring to bear upon their developing lives and to instil their hearts and minds this principle of co-operation and efficiency. We are saying to the sons of the Puritans that if they, by splendid devotion to the public weal and by sacrificial public service, will only give a high and noble example to these sons of south-eastern Europe, they will not fail to respond to that call.

Now these are the two principles upon which every stable state must rest, individual integrity, intelligence; social co-operation and efficiency. As old New England stood for those, so, please God, the new New England shall stand.

And, my brothers from the southland, as we face this new task in the new New England, to whom shall we look as our natural allies in this great task of the coming republic, where but in the southland shall we find men whose hearts respond to these same ideals. Your fathers, as ours, three hundred years ago, dared the darkness and the night, as civilization, in its sunrise, kissed these eastern shores and rescued a new land from chaos and the dark. Your fathers, as ours, dared savage beasts and still more savage men to build a home on these inhospitable shores.

There was little communication by steel and wire through two hundred years between your fathers and ours, but I think that there were telepathic messages that passed along these eastern shores through all those dreadful days, for when the call came from old New England, in response to these two principles, individual freedom, social integrity and efficiency, where did that call find its response save in the Old Dominion. I do not find that when your Washington came to take command of the sturdy men of Connecticut and Massachusetts, there was needed an interpreter who should speak his commands to their hearts, or that their ready response needed interpretation to his mighty soul. The men of the South and the men of New England were one in that hour, in response to the call of individual liberty and social co-operation and efficiency. So we may well believe that, in the new day in the southland the new New England will find her natural allies in her new task and in her new achievements.

Two centuries of common toil and common suffering, and common tears and common joys, and common defeat and common victory, bound together the old South and the old New England. God alone knows how many centuries, through the veil of the future, call to us in the new South and in the new New England, that we be joined together in common achievement, but this I know, that one generation of bitter strife and hatred shall not cancel the story of that splendid past, nor frustrate the glory of that wondrous future.

This is true, that that generation of strife did but truly interpret the two principles for which old New England, as the old South, stood, for which the new South as the new New England, must stand, upon which alone a stable state can be builded. For, is it not true that that terrible strife but served to interpret, in that one color that does not fade, the principles for which the flag of our country stands. If the men of the North, by their valor, interpreted to you what those stripes mean on the flag, which bind us to one common heritage, of thought and feeling which speak to us in eloquent terms of the unity of the Republic, then it certainly is true that the holy daring and glorious courage of the men of the South taught us in the North what those stars mean, shining each in the field of blue, speaking of individual intelligence, integrity and responsibility. (Applause). God pity us! but for the men of the South we might have forgotten. Thank God, because of the men of the South, we can never forget. (Applause). For, believe me, so long as the flag floats to the breezes it will speak this message, so long as a grateful people bear it as their standard, it will tell this story.

The truth is, Mr. President, that when the eye of the future reads that story there will be no "lost cause," but it will be known then, that in those throes of the Nation the basic principles upon which the Republic must rest forever, were revealed and declared to the world so as by fire, being borne in upon the consciousness of the nations that all people may know that in this land every man shall count one, and that in this land ties of brotherhood bind into one body of social efficiency and co-operation all the people. (Applause).

The new South asks no such commanding voice in the Nation's life as had the old South in her glorious days; the new New England asks in the Nation's life no such commanding voice as was hers in the great days of her chosen sons. Neither you nor we ask that the Nation shall play accompaniment to our solo parts, but this we believe, that the voice of the old New England shall always be heard in the symphony of America, and this we know, that the voice of the old South will always send its music into all the world. And these will bring unto this beautiful land the oppressed and down-trodden, from all parts of the earth, and mould them into a nation where each counts one and where the nation exists for the sake of all. And when the task is achieved and when the work is done, when a stable state is builded, if ever that day shall come, there will be written across its shining portals the legend of no one section or state or division, but there will be written there, for all the world to see, To the God of our Fathers, who inspired them in the past, who leads us through the present, who builds his kingdom unto the future, and who hath made of one blood all men that dwell on all the face of the earth. (Prolonged applause).

DR. WYETH: It is with very great regret which you will feel scarcely less keenly than I, that President Woodrow Wilson of Princeton University is unable to be with us this evening. The following telegram was received at three o'clock this afternoon: "I deeply regret that a severe and sudden attack of illness has deprived me of the privilege and pleasure of being present at the dinner of the New York Southern Society this evening. I deferred notifying you until this late hour hoping against hope that my physician would permit me to make the effort. It is, however, impossible. I send you my best wishes for the success of the meeting of the Southern Society. Woodrow Wilson."

While at this time we may not hear what the author of a History of the American People would have told us of "Conservatism, True and False" we are to have the pleasure of listening to a distinguished guest who has not yet heard of the toast to which he is to speak, "The Universe from Mars to Ireland," the Honorable John J. Delaney, formerly Corporation Counsel of the City of New York.

MR. DELANEY: Ladies and Gentlemen: I sat here to-night as the Second Vice-President of the Society of the Friendly Sons of St. Patrick and ate the dinner provided for the First Vice-President. (Laughter). It was only a short time ago that I learned that I was to take the place of the First Vice-President at this board because he could not come and our Society never goes unrepresented at public dinners. (Laughter). And it was only a shorter time ago that I learned that I was to take the place of Mr. Woodrow Wilson, whose absence to-night was the source of congratulations to a previous speaker. (Laughter and applause). Unless he intended handing you what might be called some queer history, I do not see why he should be glad that Woodrow Wilson was not present when he became historical. For my part I am sorry Dr. Wilson cannot hear some of the history which I may relate, whether he would like it or not. That propensity very likely comes from the fact that I represent at this board "The Friendly Sons of St. Patrick."

Now, Ladies and Gentlemen, I cannot say that I was born on the sun-kissed hills of some foreign clime (laughter) and that around the shores of the place of my birth the waters of no mild ocean ever laved. My experience was somewhat circumscribed. The nearest thing of that kind to me was the North River, and the only south about the place where I first saw the light of day was the south side of Twenty-eighth street in this City. (Laughter).

One of the earlier speakers, while he attributed to me the possession of some of the charms which the Blarney Stone is said to give, promptly went to work and took away from me the only chance I had to practice it on, this magnificent audience. He likened himself to a young elephant (laughter) sent by older ones before so as to test the presence by inviting the appetite of the crocodiles. He was proud of the part he assigned to himself and as he gazed at the ladies he expressed a willingness of meeting the fate of being snapped up. That man comes from the cool and sleepy town of Philadelphia; I bid him now, as his spiritual adviser, to beware, he must not invite any crocodiles to tackle him first. It is extremely imprudent. (Laughter). The night is dark and he is far from home. (Laughter).

In responding to this toast of "The Universe" if I should dare to lift my eyes from the dead level of the earth upon which we live to the glories which I see above me, I could not wish to have the universe as a field through which I might roam. If my eyesight was better than it is I would prefer to be here, (laughter) and might learn to become contented.

Perhaps the semblance of form which the first speaker wished to assume could be taken by myself far better than by him. But I am not inviting anybody to bring any trouble to my quiet little home. (Laughter).

I listened with wrapped attention to the beautiful apostrophe on New England and I heard graphically described, or at least graphically alluded to, the virtues of the Pilgrim Fathers, but I always remember the man who decried this excessive praise of the Pilgrim Fathers when no word is ever said about the Pilgrim Mothers, who had to live with the Pilgrim Fathers. (Laughter.)

I would like to clear up my indebtedness to the Blarney Stone. I remember the first day I saw it. My shadow was no less than it is now, and the castle was a beautiful mediaeval structure, with narrow winding staircase leading to the top; it was a warm mid-summer day and I took all the "blarney" I ever got from the pavement below with my eyes looking up. So not having paid the heroic tribute I am afraid I cannot carry out, Ladies and Gentlemen, any promise of blarney the first speaker made when he said you must not expect any humor from him, but must wait for me. He had a serious subject, that of saving this nation (laughter) while I was merely to furnish the merriment for you to-night. He allowed you to wait until another man came on, his business was all important. (Laughter). He was dealing in millions of dollars and would associate with no man of less circumstance than J. Pierpont Morgan. (Laughter).

Ladies and Gentlemen: It would be idle for me to try to be facetious because I regret I have not the faculty of humor which is so necessary for such an undertaking. But I cannot refrain from saying a few serious words for myself. I say, and I say this with all due respect to every one, that it grates on me when I hear a discourse which seems to imply that it is necessary for the Southern Society to avow its loyalty to the Union. I remember that the burning lessons in patriotism, lessons which inculcate sacrifice, if necessary, of one's life to one's country given by so many Southern poets whose names were mentioned to-night. I recall the lines of a son of South Carolina who sleeps, and for years has slept in a poet's grave, the green grass of his native state over him, the glorious Timrod.

"Come with the weapons of your call,
With musket, pipe or knife,
He wields the deadliest blade of all
Who lightest holds his life.

The arm that drives its unbought blows
With all the patriots scorn,
Might brain a tyrant with a rose
Or stab him with a thorn."

That is a sentiment which we can all remember. It teaches a lofty lesson that however lowly we may be, if in our breasts wells the spirit of true patriotism, our weakness becomes strength and though we have nothing but empty hands and prayerful hearts, we can throw whatever we have into the scale in the cause of our country. The sacrifice will be great for have we not done all that men can do to prove that we love the land of our birth, the home of our forefathers. This sentiment is a true Southern expression of Patriotism.

And when the Southern Society is perpetuating the memories of the South here in this new home of New York and recalling the evidences of the undying patriotism from Washington's day until now, of true Southern American citizens, you are not only conferring honor upon the memories of those whose blood flows in your veins, the illustrious dead, upon your fathers, and upon your mothers who bore you but you are doing more than that; you are also keeping alive in the rest of the country the appreciation of what true, loyal, honest, self-sacrificing patriotism is. Therefore, I say it is a good thing for New York, and it is a good thing for any place to have an organization like this Southern Society in its midst. Nor will any man, I believe, dispute this. And I say it, Gentlemen, without any disrespect to the South, that it is a good thing for the Southern Society and a better thing for the South that it has such a place as the great City of New York. (Applause). For if we must refer to days that were sad and that are past, I trust that together with that memory will be linked, in the thought of every man who has Southern blood in his veins, the fact that there was no place in all this world, in the hour of his grief and of his affliction where he was so welcome as in this liberal, cosmopolitan city, the greatest city of the Union. (Applause.) With a generosity, I think unequaled in all the history of the world, there never came a worthy man here, who decided to put his faith in the great City of New York, and to be part and parcel of its destiny, that New York did not welcome him and give him a place equal to that held by her greatest sons, and the newcomers could mount to distinction, and if they could attain eminence by their own exertions, the pathway was never blocked for them, A man from the South was afforded as good a chance in this great city as the man who was born within its confines. (Applause.)

If, Ladies and Gentlemen, God's providence has showered upon us great wealth, and our industry has co-operated with his graciousness, and we have thus become, perhaps the richest, in a certain sense, of all the cities of the world, there may be those who look upon us with envy—as has been intimated to-night, but they must admit both the generosity and the justice of New York, this City holds no prejudice for any man, and will teach all men that though New York be rich she is lowly in spirit, and though he envy her she does not withhold from him an opportunity to honorably acquire a share of the wealth, her generosity and her kindness. Let him come here to increase her prosperity and a due share of that which is produced shall be given to him on the same terms as to any other man. (Applause.)

I think, perhaps, I would trespass too long on your time if I said anything more on this or any other subject except one. I can only say to you that the City of New York gives to the sons of the South who come to settle here, as she always has, the heartiest kind of a greeting and I know of a welcome that I have been trained to give from childhood, culled from one of the great patriotic poets of my ancestral race, which will admirably fit this occasion and we New Yorkers say to you:

“Come in the evening or come in the morning,
Come when you're looked for or come without warning,
A thousand warm welcomes you'll find here before you
And the oftener we see you the more we adore you.”

The New York Southern Society was organized in the City of New York on the 9th day of November, 1886, and it was incorporated under the laws of the State of New York in May, 1889.
